Deed of deposit

This deed claims the first part of the archival standard at its highest level. On top of the promise that the page keeps its looks, and on top of every mark of ink saying which letter it stands for, the file says what it is made of: this line is a heading, that block is a paragraph, and the rule across the foot is furniture that says nothing at all.
Something reading the deed aloud follows the order the tree gives rather than the order the ink was laid down in, and reading software on a telephone has something to reflow.

The papers listed above were deposited on 19 January 2026 and are held for thirty years. The first part of the standard is what the depositary asks for by name, so the sheet carries nothing the part closes: no see-through paint, no part of the page that can be switched off, and no file inside it.
