The free faces, one by one

A PDF may name fourteen standard fonts without carrying them: the reading software draws them from its own copies. Where a file must carry every font it uses, as an archival file must, the library carries instead a free face drawn to the same widths, so the text keeps its place to within a tenth of a point. Each page that follows shows one of these faces at eight sizes, set against the standard font it stands in for, and every character it reaches.

Stamps and notes set in a standard font

These two stamps and these two notes name a standard font. The file carries, for each, the free face drawn to that font's widths, so every reading software draws them with the same letters.
